ANNAPOLIS, MD—Andy Shepherd was jobless, homeless in Baltimore, and suffering from alcoholism and depression before arriving 10 months ago at Peer Connection, a recovery program in Salisbury for people with addictions and mental illnesses.

Previously, Shepherd had spent time in and out of 14 rehabilitation centers and five halfway houses, he said, and had a counselor not recommended he try Peer Connection, he might not have survived on his own.

"I was at a place where I just couldn't function and couldn't get a foot up," he said. "I'm doing great now. I've got hope again."

Shepherd joined more than 400 behavioral health advocatees, care providers, patients and family members of patients in Annapolis on Thursday to show support for a pair of bills that would ensure funding and increase access

What's the Deal with Mid-Season, Out-of-Conference College Basketball Games?

By AUBURN MANN
Capital News Service

COLLEGE PARK, MD—While Maryland's blowout win over Bowie State last month might not have been any legitimate indicator of where the Terps were after their first bye, it did perhaps signal a new trend in college basketball: mid-season out-of-conference scheduling.

The Feb. 9 matchup was the third instance this season of a school playing a team outside of its interscholastic athletic conference affiliations in January or February, a period traditionally reserved for unadulterated conference competition.

A couple of weeks ago, the SEC and Big 12 held their annual challenge a more than a month after its usual slot in December to Monday Feb. 8 in women's college basketball pitted the University of Connecticut and the University of South Carolina against each other.

Around the NCAA, varying reasons were offered from this departure from convention.

In College Park, the original intention was to schedule Bowie State for December, but due to a clear conflict with Maryland's fall final examination period, the alternative was to schedule it during one of Maryland's bye weeks in February.

"Hopefully this will allow us to keep our rhythm ... and hopefully expand our bench a little bit," Terps head coach Mark

Turgeon said before the game with the Bulldogs. After a 93-62 victory orchestrated through an evenly balanced dosage of starters and reserve players, Turgeon was grateful for the opportunity for the team to get back on the court.

"It doesn't matter who your opponent is. You still have to play a 40-minute game. They are going to play defense, we're going to play offense," Turgeon said.

It's no big deal, if you ask the SEC.

"A lot of schools do this to fill byes in their schedule," said SEC spokesman Craig Pinkerton.

In the case of the SEC Big 12 Challenge, the objective was to generate more exposure for the event by scheduling it during a time where other inter-conference challenges had concluded.

"During previous seasons we would usually have the challenge in December, however, it would get lost in all the other inter-conference games," Pinkerton said. "We moved it later in the season this year, hoping that it would become a marquee event."

Indeed, the reward was the highest Nielsen rating in the history of the Big 12-SEC Challenge when Kentucky played Kansas on Jan. 30.

The University of Connecticut's women's team usually schedules a non-confer-

The Third Reconstruction Era

Moments like these give us a chance to appreciate how much change a citizen like Mrs. McLaurin has seen in her lifetime. When she was born America was firmly in the grip of Jim Crow, segregation, racial violence and political disenfranchisement that characterized the decades following the initial post-Civil War promise of Reconstruction.

In and Around Morningside-Skyline

by Mary McHale 301 735 3451

They honored him with balloons, candles at the Hangar Club

Joseph Michael "Mike" Beall, 73, a longtime resident of Pine Grove Drive in Morningside, died at home on Feb. 16. He had leukemia.

He was born in Mitchellville, son of Clarence and Lillian Beall, and graduated from Frederick Sasser High School. He joined the Army and, during a tour at Ft. Bliss, Texas, met Rita Carreón. They were married Aug. 15, 1964, at Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in El Paso. After leaving the service, the newlyweds lived in Mitchellville and District Heights before moving to Morningside in 1973.

Mike served in the Army Reserves and went to work at Pohanka as a specialist in body and fender work. He liked to hunt and fish, and follow NASCAR, and did a little racing himself years ago.

And he played pool. His wife Rita managed pool teams at Andrews Restaurant (formerly Skyline Restaurant), Tucker's (until it burned down), and most recently the Hangar Club. In memory of Possum—as they called him—his fellow pool-players carried candles and released 65 balloons.

Mike was the husband of Rita for 51 years; father of David and Danny Beall and Anita Cook; grandfather of ten and great-grandfather of two; brother of Vincent and Paul Beall, Joan Armstrong and the late Irene Botler and Debbie Corrick. Fr. Ted Hegnauer conducted a service for Mike at Lee's Funeral Home on Feb. 20.

WSSC General Manager/CEO Takes Disparity Study to Next Phase

LAUREL, MD—General Manager/CEO Carla A. Reid announced the next phase of the ongoing Disparity Study, which was launched in May of 2015. MGT of America, who is independently conducting the study, has partnered with McMillon Communications and Oppenheim Research to collect and analyze anecdotal information from the business community.

This phase of the study provides an opportunity for businesses to share experiences of doing business or attempting to do business with WSSC and its prime contractors and vendors.

"As the new General Manager and CEO of WSSC, improving stakeholder relationships is a top priority for me," said Carla A. Reid. "We can only improve by hearing from those businesses that have worked with us or participated in our procurement process about what is working and what is not. Participating in this study is an important way businesses can do that."

Participants will be randomly selected to contribute in this phase of the study via telephone interviews over the next four to six weeks. The information collected will determine the changes that must be made to procurement policies and procedures, including those of WSSC's Small, Local and Minority Business Enterprise (SLMBE) program.

Individual information will be kept confidential and aggregated for overall analysis and used only for the purposes of conducting this study.

The Disparity Study examines WSSC's four principal contracting areas – construction, architecture, engineering, and professional services and goods and other services—to determine minority—and women-owned businesses' availability to compete as prime contractors and sub-contractors in each of the four areas and the extent to which Minority Business Enterprises are used by WSSC.

For information about the Disparity Study visit <http://wsscwater.com/disparitystudy>.

WSSC Details Long-standing Program to Minimize Lead Risk

LAUREL, MD—February 19, 2016: In light of the national conversation over concerns of lead in public drinking water, WSSC's water quality experts briefed commissioners this week on the safety of the drinking supply in Montgomery and Prince George's counties. Two key points emerged: WSSC has no lead pipes in its water distribution system (which stops at a customer's property line) and WSSC adds a corrosion inhibitor to its water that coats the inside of all pipes, including those on private property.

In 2005, WSSC conducted an aggressive search to find and replace any lead pipes in the WSSC system, but many homes built before the 1986 EPA ban of lead solder may still contain sources of lead in the solder that was used to connect copper plumbing inside their homes. In accordance with EPA regulations, every three years WSSC conducts random sampling in certain homes built prior to the EPA ban. Based on the latest round of sampling in 2014, results for all homes tested were below 15 parts per billion (ppb) for lead, which is the EPA action level. Ninety-eight per cent of those tested were below 2 ppb.

Source water taken from the Potomac and Patuxent rivers is first treated by our water filtration plants where it is tested more than 500,000 times each year, including tests for lead before being sent out to homes and businesses through our 5,600 miles of distribution pipes. The results allow WSSC to make any adjustments to our operation or treatment process to maintain the highest level of water quality.

It's important for customers to know that the corrosion inhibitor WSSC adds to the water creates a coating on pipes that prevents them from leaching lead, but it's still possible that a few homes built prior to 1960 may still have lead service lines on their property. Concerned customers should contact a WSSC-Registered plumber to determine if their homes contain lead pipes in their homes or contact WSSC's Water Quality Center at 301-206-7575 about having their water tested. More information is available on the WSSC website, and WSSC's annual Water Quality Report can be found online, as well.

WSSC is regulated by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the Maryland Department of the Environment (MDE) to ensure the water we provide customers meets federal and state regulatory standards. WSSC is also closely monitored by the executive and legislative branches in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, as well as state legislators in Annapolis. WSSC has never had a drinking water violation in its 98-year history.

Cutting Your Medical Bills via Smartphone

What if your next doctor's visit could happen by smartphone from anywhere in the world? It could happen sooner than you think.

It's called telemedicine, or telehealth: The use of Internet-connected devices to communicate information about diseases, symptoms and other health data. The Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA) is driving innovators in healthcare and technology to develop apps and devices that offer greater access to healthcare products and services at a lower cost. In fact, the global telehealth market is expected to grow from $440.6 million in 2013 to $4.5 billion by 2018, according to Colorado-based research firm IHS.

How could this affect you? Though apps that measure everything from your daily walk or run to your heart rate are already available, an incredible range of options are coming. Here are some of the current and future product development trends in smartphone and wearable healthcare:

Physical activity and vitals tracking. While many major health systems and hospitals allow you to download apps that let you schedule appointments, see lab results and even communicate by email or text with your doctor, such offerings have no diagnostic value ... yet. However, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration recently released policy statements on what it calls "mobile medical apps" that will actually allow tracking of vital health data for direct interpretation by trained health professionals.

GPS Medicine. Let's say you need to fill a prescription and you want to know the cheapest place to buy it within a 10-mile radius of your office. Using technology similar to the restaurant, movie and service-finding sites you probably use now, developers are considering similar models for medical supply and service pricing data that could save you money in real time.

Diagnosis by selfie. Who knew taking a selfie could help improve your health? This new technology allows patients to take a photo of a non-life-threatening injury or rash using their cell phones (<http://www.wsj.com/articles/the-future-of-medicine-is-in-your-smartphone-1420828632>). Then, an algorithm processes the image, evaluates it and texts back the diagnosis. Developers are coming up with sensors to collect symptom- and condition-related health data, which could mean that in the future, physicians will have a lot more to work with than a mere photo.

Virtual appointments. Healthcare legislation is also expected to spur use of handheld devices to create 24/7, real-time communication between patients and practitioners for the cost of a co-pay—or less. In a 2014 report, consulting firm Deloitte said that there would be 100 million health "eVisits" globally, potentially saving over $5 billion in costs compared to those incurred by traditional physician visits.

But before you start downloading this new technology, research the following:

- Who made the app and what do the developers really know about my condition?
- What about privacy? What's in the app's usage agreement and how safe is the payment, prescription or medical data required to use the app?
- What does my primary care doctor or my insurer think about me using this app? Could using it affect my coverage in any way?
- What does it really cost to use the app and how might it affect data charges on my smartphone or tablet bill?

Bottom line: The ability to manage your healthcare by smartphone is a revolutionary concept. But before you dive in head first, learn as much as you can about the technology and whether your current health professionals and networks support it.

Agriculture Secretary Vilsack Announces $18 Million Available to Support Research and Teaching at Historically Black Land-Grant Universities

By PRESS OFFICER USDA

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Agriculture Secretary Vilsack announced $18 million in grants will be available to strengthen research and teaching at historically black land-grant universities during a meeting with the 1890's Council in Washington. The grants are available through the 1890 Institution Research, Extension, and Teaching Capacity Building Grants program administered by USDA's National Institute of Food and Agriculture (NIFA).

"There is an increasing need for highly skilled workers to fill agriculture, nutrition and natural resources jobs, and too few students graduating in those fields," said Secretary Tom Vilsack. "This support from USDA will ensure our 1890s universities can educate talented, skilled professionals to help us meet future food security challenges."

NIFA provides support to historically black colleges and universities that were designated as land-grant universities in the Second Morrill Act of 1890. The Capacity Building Grants (CBG) program supports agricultural science programs while strengthening the linkages among the 1890 universities, other education institutions, USDA, and private industry. The program focuses on advancing cultural diversity in the scientific and professional workforce by attracting and educating more students from under-represented groups. Grants are awarded in the categories of research, teaching and extension with a focus on NIFA's priority areas of sustainable bioenergy, food security, childhood obesity prevention, climate change, and food safety. Since 2009, NIFA has awarded more than $122 million in grants to support 1890 land-grant universities through the CBG program.

Applications are due March 31. Please see the request for applications for more information.

In addition to single institution and joint project applications, the CBG program features professional development grants to help faculty enhance their networking and competitive capacity by working collaboratively with colleagues from 1890 and 1862 land-grant universities, other public and private universities, federal agencies, private and non-governmental institutions, foundations, and other domestic and international research entities. The training, which may take the form of sabbaticals, mini-sabbaticals, faculty exchanges, or educational courses, must address critical U.S. food, agricultural and human science issues at the local, state, regional, and national level.

Previous projects funded through this program include a research grant awarded to South Carolina State University for study on the economic effects of the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) on food safety and the environment, as well as the effects of state environmental regulations on state agricultural exports. Prairie View A&M University used a previous grant to develop a Master of Science degree in human nutrition. Southern University in Louisiana offers educational support to families and assesses Family and Consumer Sciences curriculum in child development, due to a CBG grant.

Since 2009, NIFA has invested in and advanced innovative and transformative initiatives to solve societal challenges and ensure the long-term viability of agriculture. NIFA's integrated research, education, and extension programs, supporting the best and brightest scientists and extension personnel, have resulted in user-inspired, groundbreaking discoveries that are combating childhood obesity, improving and sustaining rural economic growth, addressing water availability issues, increasing food production, finding new sources of energy, mitigating climate variability, and ensuring food safety. Health from A1 to services for people suffering from mental health and substance use disorders.

"Mental health matters," said Sen. Guy Guzzone, D-Howard, at the rally. "For years and years in our society, we haven't done a good job."

Funding for behavioral health—the umbrella term for mental health and substance abuse disorders—has never been mandated in the state's budget, so it does not automatically adjust with inflation. The Keep the Door Open Act, sponsored by Guzzone, would ensure that funding for behavioral health providers is indexed in the budget beginning in fiscal year 2018, without needing to be renewed by the legislature.

"Behavioral health may not be a household name, but it's definitely a household need," said Delegate Antonio Hayes, D-Baltimore, who is sponsoring the Keep the Door Act on the House side.

The spending mandate would require an additional $17 million in increased general fund expenditures in 2018, and would increase to $20.6 million by 2021, according to a statement of opposition submitted by the Maryland Department of Budget and Management.

The legislature has increased behavioral health funding to match inflation six times in the past 20 years, with an average annual increase of around .6 percent per year, said Richard Bearman, executive director of Go-Getters, a Salisbury support community for people with behavioral health disorders.

"Over the years, what we have seen is a little here, a little there. It's been very sporadic," said Gerry McGloin, executive director of Pathways, a behavioral health treatment and rehab center in St. Mary's County.

Some healthcare insurance providers will cover mental health services, but programs like Pathways and Go-Getters, which runs Peer Connection, depend largely on state funding from the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene to run their clinics.

Money has gotten tight, McGloin said, and Pathways has had problems retaining staff and budgeting resources.

Approximately half of all mental health patients also have substance abuse disorders, said McGloin, so programs often treat the two conditions together.

The average lifespan for a person with a mental illness is 25 years below that of the general population because many of them have chronic diseases that they do not know how to take care of on their own, said Bearman.

The Department of Health and Mental Hygiene would be required under the second bill to develop a plan ensuring 24/7 statewide access to behavioral health services like walk-in clinics and mobile crisis teams.

Mobile crisis teams operate in 13 counties, and Frederick, Howard, and Montgomery Counties have crisis walk-in centers, with the latter two providing free 24/7 crisis hotlines and access to counselors. Expanding the current crisis services statewide would require an estimated $33 million more annually, according to a letter submitted by Department of Health and Mental Hygiene in opposition to the second bill.

The state passed legislation in 2002 that attempted to address the issue of mental health crisis response, but the law contained conditional language dependent on federal funding that never came, said Maryland Behavioral Health Coalition spokesman Dan Martin.

"What we have now isn't as much a system as it is a patchwork of services," Martin said. "It's time now to really step forward and have the state put together a plan."

Staffing and equipment for mobile crisis response teams are too expensive for many behavioral health services to maintain, said McGloin.

The Department of Health and Mental Hygiene is already working with counties to develop and expand crisis services, and the task force needed to develop further plans under the second bill would not be worth the extra money and manpower, said Allison Taylor, the department's director of governmental affairs.

The state needs better access to behavioral health programs like the one that saved his life, Shepherd said.

"This is an indication that our time is coming," he said.

"The last couple years, we have played South Carolina, and in years before that we have played Duke or North Carolina or Oklahoma," said University of Connecticut Women's Basketball spokesman Patrick McKenna.

"It's just another chance to play a really good opponent on national television."

The nationally ranked (then No. 2) Terrapins' brief escape from Big Ten play to head across the Capital Beltway to face Division II-bound Bowie Bulldogs of the Central Intercollegiate Athletic Association (CIAA) was not only conceived as a good way to counteract a long bye week. It also presented another opportunity for the Terps to play local schools.

Last fall, Maryland took on Georgetown University and Mount St. Mary's University—and beat them both.

"The idea was to stay fresh against a local team," said University of Maryland men's basketball spokesman Zach Bolno. "Since a lot of the student athletes are from the Maryland area, it offers a great chance to play against familiar foes."

Although not certain about specifics for next season, Bolno said he was sure that meetings with other Washington area teams will be on the schedule, including a rematch against Georgetown at the Verizon Center for the 2016 Big Ten-Big East Challenge.

Cardin, Durbin Introduce 'CLEAR Act' to Ensure Safer Drinking Water for American Communities

WASHINGTON, D.C.—U.S. Senators Ben Cardin (D-Md.) and Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) today introduced S. 2587, the Copper and Lead Evaluation, Assessment and Reporting Act of 2016 (CLEAR Act), to better protect the American public from being poisoned by its drinking water supplies.

The CLEAR Act directs the Environmental Protection Agency to develop new ways to improve the reporting, testing and monitoring of lead and copper levels in America's drinking water, addressing an urgent need brought to light in Flint, Mich., that exists in communities nationwide.

"The loss of safe drinking water supplies in Flint and in communities across the country has given rise to a crisis of public confidence that should never be allowed to exist in America," said Senator Cardin, a senior member of the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works. "The CLEAR Act will work to restore the public trust in its drinking water by improving safety testing and ensuring our communities know immediately should their drinking water safety ever be compromised."

"A recent Chicago Tribune report highlighted the risks that aging water infrastructure can pose to residents of cities like Chicago where nearly 80 percent of homes are connected to pipes that contain lead," said Senator Durbin. "The crisis in Flint has brought national attention to the threat of elevated levels of lead in drinking water and the danger that can be to children and families if left untreated. The CLEAR Act focuses on common-sense reforms to give Americans more information about the safety of their drinking water."

By codifying into law the December 2015 recommendations of the National Drinking Water Advisory Council for long-term revisions to EPA standards for lead and copper, the CLEAR Act (S. 2587) acts on broadly backed, consensus recommendations for reform. These include:

- Establishing a health-based, household action level that triggers a report to the consumer and to the applicable health agency for follow-up.
- Adding targeted outreach to consumers with lead service lines and other vulnerable populations and their caregivers/healthcare providers.
- Encouraging public accountability through better online reporting from utilities to the public.

The Third Reconstruction Era

Many of us have been thrilled by the video of 106-year-old mentor and school volunteer Mrs. Virginia McLaurin visiting the White House during a Black History Month celebration to meet — and dance with — President and Mrs. Obama. Her joy in being there and fulfilling her dream of meeting the first African-American President and First Lady was infectious. Born a child of South Carolina sharecroppers in 1909, this was a day she never dreamed would come: "I didn't think I'd ever live to see a colored president. I am so happy."

Moments like these give us a chance to appreciate how much change a citizen like Mrs. McLaurin has seen in her lifetime. When she was born America was firmly in the grip of Jim Crow, segregation, racial violence and political disenfranchisement that characterized the decades following the initial post-Civil War promise of Reconstruction. She moved to Washington, D.C. in 1941, in time to see the activism of A. Philip Randolph, Bayard Rustin and others urging the federal government to desegregate our armed forces and provide more economic opportunity for African-Americans. She saw burgeoning civil rights activities like these surge into a transforming movement across the South including the 1963 March on Washington in her new hometown. And she saw the Civil Rights Movement lead to significant changes—enough to allow her to visit President and Mrs. Obama in the White House in 2016.

When we look at arcs of history like this, where are we today? Many scholars see the Civil Rights Movement as a second Reconstruction Era and a second try at rebuilding our nation into one truly committed to liberty and justice for all. But just as the progress of the first Reconstruction was followed by decades of retrenchment and reversal, many of the formidable threats millions of poor children and families of all races but especially children of color face today are very dangerous steps backwards. Unjust racial profiling and killing of Black boys and men by law enforcement officers enjoined to protect them; mass incarceration of people of color—especially Black males; massive attacks on voting rights which especially impact the poor, people of color, the elderly, disabled and the young; and resegregation and standard schools denying millions of poor Black, Latino and Native American children basic literacy, numeracy and other skills they will need to work in our increasingly competitive globalized economy should be siren calls to wake up and fight back.

Past lessons have led some scholars and observers to believe we may be in a second post-Reconstruction Era, fighting deliberate widespread well-funded regression and backlash against progress made. But Rev. Dr. William J. Barber II, the head of North Carolina's NAACP chapter and a leader in the "Moral Mondays" movement, views this historical moment with optimism but urges vigilance. In his new book with Jonathan Wilson-Hartgrove, The Third Reconstruction: Moral Mondays, Fusion Politics, and the Rise of a New Justice Movement, Dr. Barber argues that the beginnings of a Third Reconstruction are underway—rooted in "fusion politics" that have changed our nation before and can do it again.

The Third Reconstruction describes how what has become the Forward Together Moral Movement was the outgrowth of several years of theological education and grassroots organizing in North Carolina that coalesced in 2013 with Moral Mondays, a nonviolent civil disobedience campaign of protests, rallies, and arrests that has been adapted in other states, including Florida, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Ohio and New York. The multi-faith, multiracial movement is committed to a 14-point People's Agenda including education, health care, the economy and reforming the justice and electoral systems, and is supported by over 150 coalition partners. The book describes the historical impact that can occur when people are willing to form strong coalitions for change. The coalition in North Carolina includes progressive people of faith, union members, immigrants, Appalachian workers and many more and may be a model for others committed to racial and economic justice.

National Urban League

The Mighty 9 Push a 21st Century Agenda for Jobs and Freedom

"Elections determine who is in power, but they do not determine how power is used."

—Paul Collier, The Bottom Billion, June 1, 2007

With American citizenship comes great responsibility. Since the birth of this nation, every four years we decide who will take on the mantle of president. No decision we make as citizens could have a more profound impact on our lives—and in the broader international arena. When we determine who will take on the role of commander in chief, we effectively decide our national priorities, our agenda and under what political philosophy we wish to be governed. Voting for a president is neither an exercise to be taken lightly or undertaken in blissful ignorance. Every four years, you are challenged to choose the candidate who promotes your agenda.

At the National Urban League, our agenda revolves around education, jobs and justice. This is not about endorsing candidates; it's about endorsing democracy. This is not about endorsing a particular politician; it's about endorsing those ideas that benefit communities of color, benefit our cities and benefit all low-income and working-class Americans. The National Urban League, along with the heads of eight other historic civil rights organizations, recently met with democratic presidential candidates Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders to hear their respective platforms and to promote our respective agendas.

In addition to myself, the meetings included:

- Melanie Campbell, National Coalition on Black Civic Participation
- Cornell W. Brooks, NAACP
- The Rev. Al Sharpton, National Action Network
- Kristen Clarke, Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law
- Wade Henderson, Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights
- Benjamin L. Crump, National Bar Association
- Sherrilyn Ifill, NAACP Legal defense and Education Fund
- Ingrid Saunders Jones and Janice Mathis, National Council of Negro Women

The political truth is that, today, a candidate for the office of president will find it almost impossible to win a nomination without the support of African-American and Hispanic voters. Communities of color are a large voting bloc and their concerns must be acknowledged as vital, top-of-the-agenda items.

We covered much of those items with the would-be-presidents using the coalition's "21st Century Agenda for Jobs and Freedom" as a framework. The public policy paper, developed almost five years ago in a series of meetings attended by nearly 60 leading civil rights, social justice, business and community leaders in Washington, D.C., identified five urgent domestic goals for our nation:

1. Achieve Economic Parity for African-Americans;
2. Promote Equity in Educational Opportunity;
3. Protect and Defend Voting Rights;
4. Promote a Healthier Nation by Eliminating Healthcare Disparities; and
5. Achieve Comprehensive Criminal Justice System Reform

Both of the candidates spoke candidly on a host of these issues—and more. Both of the candidates demonstrated an ability to speak fluently and fluidly on the topics of race relations and racial inequality, and how the enduring pairing of the two has had a devastating impact on communities of color all around our nation. It was important for those of us gathered around the table to understand that as the first Black family to reside in the White House moves out of 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, the concerns of Black Americans and underserved communities aren't swept under the rug behind them—to paraphrase my esteemed colleague Rev. Al Sharpton of National Action Network.

Our goal is to help set an agenda for the next president, but that agenda will ultimately be set with every individual vote cast. You have a seat at the table too. Find out where the candidates stand on the issues that are important to you and cast a vote—and make sure your family and friends are doing the same—because your vote is your access to the proverbial table. It is your unique opportunity to let the candidates know what is most important to you.

I hope this will not be the last meeting between civil rights groups and presidential candidates. The invitations have been sent and we look forward to more conversations, because in politics, there are no permanent allies or permanent enemies, only permanent interests.

So is Winter Finally Starting to Get You Down?

You seldom, if ever, hear people complaining that Spring has hung around too long. But Winter? Yes, skiers may never want it to end, but for most of us, it seems to drag on way too long.

Right about now is when the mid-winter blues become most common. They can make you feel sad or lacking for energy, yet apparently for no real reason.

The name that mental health experts use for this condition is Seasonal Affective Disorder, or S.A.D. They believe it's tied to the reduced amounts of sunlight and activity that most of us face in the Winter.

It's estimated that about 9% of the population in the northern parts of the country have the winter blues, but even in southern states such as Florida, an estimated 1.5% of people suffer from this condition.

For most people, S.A.D. takes the form of mild depression. Symptoms can be reduced energy, decreased participation in once-liked activities and loss of interest in what had normally been enjoyable.

But in some cases, S.A.D. can be strong enough to cause severe depression, severe enough to raise the chances of suicide or possibly require hospitalization.

Fortunately, there are ways to fight these mid-winter blahs. One simple remedy is getting out more into the daylight. Researchers report even a ten minute exposure to the sun can help brighten a person's mood and overall attitude.

There's also evidence that increasing your level of exercise can help limit those winter blues. Even on the coldest days, just bundling up and getting out for a walk or to play with the kids or dog can improve your day.

It also helps to put extra effort into activities you know bring you joy. Getting together with family or friends, going to a movie, working at a favorite hobby, or just lunching with someone special, can all help raise your spirits. What you want to avoid is withdrawing and sitting on the couch focusing on feeling blue.

So if Winter has you a little down, fine. But if you find that your winter blues, or those of someone close to you, are severe enough to truly affect your life negatively, talk to your family physician or consult a professional counselor.

From counseling, to various light treatments, to pharmaceutical therapies, there are a variety of options that mental health professionals have available to help keep S.A.D. from ruining your life.

EDC 'Activates Prosperity' by Matchmaking 300 Small Business With $16 Billion in Federal and County Procurement Opportunities

By PRESS OFFICER
AAA Mid-Atlantic

LARGO, MD—Local companies flocked to the Prince George's County Economic Development Corporation (EDC) as top executives from the U.S. Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. Department of the Treasury, the U.S. Small Business Administration and the Prince George's County Office of Central Services gave specific details on how to prepare for and tap into the $16 billion in procurement opportunities available through these agencies. The EDC's IRS Procurement Opportunity Day provided local businesses with specific contracting opportunities available, including bid solicitations and procurement forecasts, as well as direction on how to submit bids on those lucrative contracts.

"We 'Activate Prosperity' through matchmaking; we 'Activate Prosperity' through contracting," said EDC President and CEO Jim Coleman. "We are creating multimillionaires here at the EDC by matchmaking our local small businesses with large federal agencies and making sure they are ready to compete to win these contracts. I want our businesses to tap into the $16 billion in contracting opportunities available from the four agencies we have here today."

Today's IRS Procurement Opportunity Day is an integral part of the EDC's 'Activate Prosperity' initiative; an aggressive three-year plan designed to rapidly grow Prince George's County businesses by connecting them with valuable resources and programs; thereby creating more jobs for County residents.

"We believe that it is our responsibility to ensure that all of Prince George's County's local businesses are aware of the opportunities in their own backyards," said EDC Business Development Director John Mason. "To be able to have access to high level federal decision-makers, and an economic development team excited about matchmaking companies with key federal agencies can really boost a company's revenues. Now is the best time ever to expand a business in Prince George's County."

Panelists at today's game changing event shared with attendees the types of goods and services that are most often contracted for in each of their respective agencies. The majority of the contracting opportunities were for Information Technology consulting firms, a targeted industry sector for the County that brings high wage jobs and is on a strong growth trajectory.

"The true key to success in winning contracts with the IRS is all about doing your homework," said LaTonya Bowman, Small Business Specialist with the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. "There are numerous opportunities to partner with the IRS, and thereby, assist them in achieving their procurement goals. To truly engage in those procurements, one must know what the IRS is buying, when they are buying, and then connect with the IRS Small Business Office ready to discuss your company's capabilities. Last year, the IRS bought more than $520 million in non-IT products and services and more than $1.3 billion in IT products and services."

The Prince George's County Office of Central Services also provided key information on how to do business with the County through its Contract Administration and Procurement Division that purchases everything from pencils to libraries to helicopters. Solicitations from the County can be found on the County's website as well as on the E-Maryland Market Place website.

"One of the most aggressive procurement opportunities that the County is currently soliciting for is a Public-Private Partnership with Corvias Solutions to provide services in the County's $1.2 billion stormwater management project," said Roland Jones, Director of the Prince George's Office of Central Services. "In addition, the Excelon PEPCO merger, which will bring together the top performing gas and electric utilities in the Mid-Atlantic, will also present a large number of contracting opportunities in the near future. Stormwater and the utilities are very sustainable industries that local companies should not overlook."

Mobile SEO Technologies, one of the sponsors of the event provided text-to-talk technology allowing questions from the audience to be provided via text messages. The event was also sponsored by NAI Michael Companies and Berman Enterprises.

"Today, we learned about the tools we need to enhance our opportunity to procure with the federal government. The contacts and references we received are invaluable," said Thomas and Gretta Anderson, owners of Itec Solutions in Upper Marlboro, Maryland. "We can now email a key official we've met with the IRS and be able to reference this event as a starting point for a conversation. We feel like we have an 'in' with the federal government, and that can mean great growth for our company in the very near future. We are very glad that we came out to this event."

The next EDC event will be the 'Connections for Success' forum on March 14, 2016 and will address "Enhancing Relationships With Customers for Long Term Growth", in partnership with the Prince George's Chamber of Commerce. The event will be from 9 a.m. to 12:00 p.m. at 1801 McCormick Drive, Suite 140, Largo, MD 20772.

13 Hours: The Secret Soldiers of Benghazi

13 Hours: The Secret Soldiers of Benghazi
Grade: B
Rated R, a lot of graphic combat violence including grotesque images, plus military-grade swearing
2 hrs., 24 min

Michael Bay hasn't directed many movies that were good, but he's directed even fewer that were political (chanting "USA! USA!" isn't the same as being political). So we shouldn't be surprised that 13 Hours, Bay's movie about the Benghazi attacks of 2012, is far more interested in the bullets, bombs, and bodies of the affair than it is in the hearings and investigations that followed it. The whole subject may be politically charged, but don't forget: Michael Bay is first and foremost a dumb guy.

This is one of his better films, actually, a fairly mature and level-headed combat drama that follows a well-worn path with smooth confidence. Adapted by Chuck Hogan from Mitchell Zuckoff's book, 13 Hours isn't burdened with the cheesy dialogue and moronic humor that have plagued so many Bayopics, and the director's other usual excesses are reined in. Oh, there are blood-spraying headshots, and bodies being run over by cars (Bay likes that), and a Pearl Harbor-ish moment where we follow the bomb's point of view as it descends on a target (always a favorite). But in general, Bay seems serious about telling an intense, fact-based story along the lines of Zero Dark Thirty, albeit without that film's level of tension and gravitas.

We arrive in Benghazi, Libya, with Jack Da Silva (John Krasinski), a Navy SEAL now working with other ex-military as security contractors for the CIA, which has a secret base in the city. A mile away is an American "temporary diplomatic outpost"—not an official embassy, crucially, or it would have tighter security—where the U.S. ambassador to Libya, Chris Stevens (Matt Letscher), is due to visit from Tripoli.

At this point, Benghazi is one of the most dangerous places in the world. The post-Gaddafi government is opposed by rebel forces (the bad guys), which are in turn opposed by a militia called the February 17th Martyrs Brigade (the good guys). The trouble, as Jack's fellow SEAL Tyrone "Rone" Woods (James Badge Dale) explains, is that "not only is hot as balls, you can't tell the good guys from the bad guys." They're all Libyan and heavily armed, and it's not like they wear uniforms.

Jack, Rone, and the other members of the Global Response Staff (as they are called) may have difficulty knowing who can be trusted, but the movie makes sure we know who can't: the wormy, cowardly CIA chief (Dave Costabile) in charge of the base. His first action in the movie is to deny Jack and Rone support during a scuffle with locals because he insists on keeping a low profile.

Then there's his declaration that "there is no real threat" in Benghazi (a line engineered to make us howl at his shortsightedness), plus an overall reluctance to get involved in anything. Also, in a movie full of buff guys, he's doughy. Bro doesn't even lift.

When the not-an-embassy is overrun by a mob, the G.R.S. guys are eager to lend a hand but are hindered by the Chief's dithering and the thick, sticky bureaucracy of having a secret CIA base. (If they rush over to help, it will be hard to keep pretending the CIA base doesn't exist.) Secrecy is eventually a moot point, and the question becomes whether the U.S. can send help that will a) arrive in time to be helpful and b) not start a war. The issue of how (or whether) to send backup during the attack has of course been the subject of much scrutiny in the three years since it happened, but Bay doesn't blame an agenda, a conspiracy, or even incompetence for the four American deaths. His theory seems to be, "Hey, red tape and protocol, whaddaya gonna do?" (In case you were wondering, Hillary Clinton is never mentioned.)

The combat sequences deliver what they're supposed to, hindered only a little by Bay's patented Confuse-O-Vision® shaky-cam technology, and helped considerably by the camaraderie among the men (who call each other "brother" and seem to mean it). Besides Jack and Rone, there's smart-aleck Tanto (Pablo Schreiber), philosophical Boon (David Denman), indestructible Oz (Max Martini), and Tig (Dominic Fumusa), whose personality trait I didn't catch but who seems valuable to the team. Their downtime conversations ring true, and the montage of their Skype and FaceTime calls back home to their families is just the right level of sappy.

Like a lot of war movies, this one doesn't have a purpose beyond thrilling us with bloody combat and brave heroism, no themes deeper than "we have to kill the bad guys when they attack us." That may be why, for as engaging as it is, it's never emotionally stirring in the way that the great war movies are, nor does it give the sense that this battle had any long-term significance. It's a good, ordinary movie about a very bad day.

The Edge of Sports by DAVE ZIRIN

The Tactical Intelligence of #NoJusticeNoLeBron

Tamir Rice will forever be 12 years old, sentenced to death by Cleveland's police for holding a toy gun and "being a child while black." In the aftermath of the grand jury's inability to even secure an indictment, Baltimore-based journalist Tariq Toure started the hashtag #NoJusticeNoLeBron which aimed to "Call on LeBron James to lead a collective sit out on MLK day in solidarity with Tamir Rice and his family." (Read Tariq Toure's full explanation of his motivations here.)

This demand put before Cleveland's basketball messiah provoked a biblical-sized backlash comprised of one of the more bizarre combinations of people imaginable: people who love LeBron James and saw the hashtag as some kind of attack against him; people who despise the #BlackLivesMatter movement, particularly some of the young leadership who embraced this call; and people who stand with the struggle 1000% but think in the words of Professor Lou Moore, "the idea of attempting to force a black man into doing anything seems an awful folly for activists to pursue."

I strongly agree with Lou Moore and countless others that the idea black athletes have some kind of greater responsibility to speak out after such an egregious injustice, is grossly unfair. I've written repeatedly that it's long past time for white athletes to be put on the hot seat. Ask Kevin Love to sit out. Ask Matthew Dellavedova to sit out. Ask them all. Their hometown police murdered a twelve-year-old. It shouldn't be business as usual in the wake such a tragedy.

But the call for LeBron to sit out one game on the day we celebrate Dr. King's birth contains a measure of strategic genius that people who stand with #BlackLivesMatter yet disagree with this hashtag, should take seriously.

First and foremost, it is highly disingenuous to pretend that LeBron is just another athlete, especially in Cleveland, and is being asked to boycott solely because of the historic burden foisted upon black athletes to do more than just play. LeBron has asked for this weight, even demanded it. He has dramatically commented on other racist killings, organizing the Heat to pay tribute to the late Trayvon Martin by getting the team to pose in hoodies and having most of the Cavaliers last year wearing "I Can't Breathe" shirts after the Staten Island police choked Eric Garner to death.

LeBron has also spoken repeatedly about his desire to be a "global icon like Muhammad Ali," and his dreams of dunking on George W. Bush. He even uses the incendiary Public Enemy track Welcome to the Terrordome in his new Samsung Commercial.

But the fact that Tamir Rice was killed in Cleveland makes the connection to LeBron all the more acute. Upon choosing to return home, LeBron said, "This is not about the roster or the organization. I feel my calling here goes above basketball. I have a responsibility to lead, in more ways than one, and I take that very seriously. My presence can make a difference in Miami, but I think it can mean more where I'm from. I want kids in Northeast Ohio, like the hundreds of Akron third-graders I sponsor through my foundation, to realize that there's no better place to grow up."

Again, he has asked for this weight and there is nothing wrong with Tariq Toure, inspired by LeBron's conscience, to ask him to act upon the killing of one of the precious "kids in Northeast, Ohio." Tariq Toure's implicit point is, if you are going to use Public Enemy and say you want to be the Ali of the 21st century, people are going to ask you to back that crap up. Or as Toure wrote more eloquently, "The reason I went as far as to ask you to sit out is because every bit of empathetic work you have done makes you the archetype for this sort of leadership. Whether it be hoodies, t-shirts or 4th quarter comebacks, your energy commands allegiance."

The indispensable Twitter feed Prison Culture commented negatively about the hashtag, writing, "Go tell white athletes to show some solidarity on the matter of #TamirRice. Enough. This is a problem of WHITENESS and its deadline."

But the motivation for this initiative is precisely rooted in the belief that those in power—as well as the white mass of Cleveland sports fans—are blithely ignoring this injustice. The hope is that LeBron, with all of his fame, can puncture privilege, tear the blinders off of those who care more about a Cavs championship than a police murder of a child, and get people to "see" Tamir Rice.

If one agrees that white people need to confront the reality of this killing—and all the police violence that dots

EARTH TALK ... Is Apple Outsourcing Production to China in Order to Avoid U.S. Labor Standards

Dear EarthTalk:

Is it true that Apple gets around U.S. labor standards and laws by outsourcing production to China?

—Josie Walsh,
 New York, NY

Apple isn't the only tech giant outsourcing much of its production to Chinese manufacturers nowadays, but the sheer popularity of the California-based company's products makes it an especially easy target for activists concerned about worker health and safety. China Labor Watch and other groups have exposed inhumane conditions at huge Chinese factories of suppliers like Foxconn and Pegatron that support many U.S.-based tech firms. Workers at these facilities, many who are underage, are often required to work 18-hour shifts and are routinely exposed to toxic chemicals—but still can barely make ends meet. The problem came to a head in 2010 when journalists got word that 14 workers had committed suicide at Foxconn's massive iPhone-assembly manufacturing facility in China.

Another issue dogging Apple's Chinese partners is worker exposure to toxic chemicals and a higher than average incidence of leukemia among employees. Apple agreed to discontinue using two of the worst offenders, benzene and n-hexane, after the non-profit groups China Labor

Watch and Green America collected upwards of 40,000 signatures from consumers demanding action from the company. But China still allows its manufacturing sector to use several other carcinogenic chemicals long outlawed in the U.S. and Europe. Repeated exposure to these substances is another threat Chinese workers have to contend with when working on the assembly line making smartphones and other tech gadgets.

Despite knowledge of the dangerous conditions, Apple's Chinese suppliers rarely struggle to find workers, many of whom are willing to take the relatively high paying jobs despite the risks—especially if they are supporting loved ones at home who depend upon the extra money to survive. China's huge population creates an infinite supply of workers, such that even a large-scale walkout would be pointless. The assembly line system gives each person a repetitive, simple job that can be taught in an hour.

For its part, Apple continues to claim they are investigating the situation and doing everything they can to ensure satisfactory working conditions. In 2010, the company revamped its supplier responsibility standards and threatened it would terminate relations with Chinese manufacturers that refuse to toe the line, and also called for new audits on all of its "final assembly" facilities in China. Two years later, Apple became the first technology company admitted to the Fair Labor Association, a non-profit that conducts independent monitoring and verification to ensure acceptable workplace standards. While this affiliation doesn't mean Foxconn, Pegatron and other Chinese high tech suppliers are beholden to standards as stringent as U.S. labor laws, activists consider it a step in the right direction and continue to keep an eye on the situation.

Of course, whether or not Apple steps up on the issue may depend more on if consumers are willing to forego the company's products due to worker exploitation issues. And that's not likely to happen anytime soon, as Americans and others continue to buy iPhones, iPads and Macs as fast as Apple and its Chinese partners can produce them.

the country—consider that Tariq Toure alone has been able to put discussion of this debate on ESPN, on popular sports websites, on the Network News, and on sports radio; in other words, in front of white eyes and ears. Most of these commentators derided the call, defending LeBron like he is a fragile flower who might wither in the face of a hashtag. Let them bloviate. Millions of readers and listeners had to reckon with the death of Tamir Rice, amidst New Year's college football bowl coverage, and see the face of a child the mainstream media and Cleveland politicians wanted to relegate to the holiday shadows.

Tariq Toure saw that the most powerful sports/politics moment of 2015 was the 69% black Missouri Tigers football team threatening to strike against racism on campus and bringing down a university president. That didn't happen by accident. It happened because they were engaged by the movement and then their actions brought the crisis in Columbia, Missouri to the world. They risked their scholarships and their futures. But the risk is precisely what made it matter.

That's the power of sports as a megaphone for issues that transcend the playing field. This hashtag comes from a place of struggle and desire for change. Are activists using LeBron and using sports to project their issue to a higher cultural plateau? Absolutely! Do people in power use sports all the time to advance nationalism, US militarism, sexism, and in the case of a certain football team, rank racism? You betchya, they do.

The lovers of LeBron will always defend him. The haters of Black Lives Matter will always find an excuse. But the people who want to see change should see athletes as potential and powerful allies. If we don't engage them with the world outside the athletic bubble, then inside the bubble they shall remain.

Water from A4

- Requiring public water systems to provide a public statement of lead service line ownership where a community has lead service lines.

- Modifying monitoring requirements to provide for voluntary, consumer-requested tap samples for lead.

- Utilizing results of tap samples for lead to inform consumer action to reduce the risks in their homes. Informing the appropriate health agency when results are above a designated household action level.

- Assessing the effectiveness of corrosion control treatment or other reasons for elevated lead results.

"No one in America should be without access to safe drinking water. But when that safety is threatened, the challenge can often be identifying the impacted areas and immediately informing residents," said Senator Durbin. "The CLEAR Act should help make that process easier."

"Healthy water is one of the most basic human needs, and guaranteeing safe public drinking water is one of the most basic responsibilities of our government," Senator Cardin added. "The American people need to be able to trust that their drinking water is being managed and monitored to the best of our abilities and in the most transparent manner possible. The CLEAR Act will move us decisively toward these goals."
